Environmental Information about Barli Development Institute for Rural Women Campus

Barli Development Institute for Rural Women tries its best to remain an environmentally friendly campus. Some of them that are almost entirely self-sufficient. It serves as a working model for caring for the environment and as a demonstration center for rural technologies. It ensures as many products as possible are made using biodegradable materials through innovation and an Eco-friendly approach.

- Approximately 50% of the Institute campus is occupied by roads, parking, buildings, lawns and other amenities. The rest of the area is used for agriculture or horticulture
- All of the vegetables used for food at the Institute are grown on campus.
- During the winter when there is a surplus of vegetables, these vegetables are dried in low cost solar tunnel driers. This provides the Institute kitchen with a supply of vegetables during the dry season.
- Vegetable peel, spoilt or dried fruit, and other biodegradable material is composted and reused to grow vegetables and crops
- Wastepaper, used newspapers, tree leaves and farm waste is made into briquettes.
- For more than 10 years, all rainwater falling on roofs of building, roads, yards and agriculture land has been harvested through a system of small ponds and pipelines with chambers to arrest silt and floating material.
- Washing-bathing and sewage water are re-used water for irrigation.
- Solar collectors heat all bathing and washing water; there are no electric geysers on campus.
- Solar cookers cook 3 meals a day for 100 people approximately 300 days of the year, briquettes and wood from campus trees are used the remaining 65 days.
- Every effort is made to save electricity: Only CFLs and other energy efficient lights are used and passive infrared detectors control all campus exterior lighting.
- Eco-friendly products are made from used and discarded materials: exhausted batteries into artistic paperweights, scraps of material into glass holders for hot tea, rice sacks are embroidered and turned into colourful carry bags etc...
- Fallen hair collected in the girls dormitories is made into batik brushes.
